Although it is clearly supposed to be, judging by the blind critical reaction, a tense, stimulating, violent and difficult film, I found it too dreary, too melodramatic, too obvious and, above all, too long. There are few movies that can, successfully, hold me seized for 2hrs35min. JFK is one and that the other Gyllenhaal detective Zodiac is another, but what they had, that the prisoners forgotten, was a complex, captivating police narrative with perhaps many solutions and real characters. It is in these two areas that prisoners are sorely lacking. Focusing, for now, on the little good in the film, Prisoners is very well shot by the seasoned director of photography, Roger Deakins and not badly played by the star-studded, Oscar grabby casting, not that they are given much to work with. That being said, my first problem with the kidnapping plot is that it was obvious. If you, like my wife and I, indulge in your stupid brain cells every week by watching 45min detective procederes like The Mentalist, Castle, Elementary, White Collar or whatever, then you'll see the end of the movie coming a mile away. That's because, the way he was set up and as he kept playing, there were only a handful of ways he could play. Now, I'm sure, for those who are not so used to the simple twists of the evening television, prisoners may have been a gripping whodunit, but, I'm sorry, if you've read, even slightly, detective-oriented books or watched a murder, she wrote then you'll know the plot, as I did, 45mins and will have to sit there for another 1h and 45mins to wait , grumpy, tattooed Jake Gyllenhaal to work it too. What he finally does, but even his, supposedly brilliant, never lost a case detective is beaten to the punch by very angry indeed Hugh Jackman. The Gyllenhaal detective is supposed to be a tortured, obstinate genius, but we never see any evidence of him really doing something insightful or insightful, he's not a fantastic puzzle solver, good with people in particular and there doesn't seem to be a big flying intellect at of her eyebrow-sized furrow, her head slicked back. He hit me as one of those characters him and the director talked incessantly, but forgot to put one of the motivations in the actual script. We are told in dialogue that it is brilliant and we are just supposed to take it as read, read, the fact that everything he does is a mundane and routine investigation. Yes, he has tattoos, a grumpy face and spends Thanksgiving alone in Chinese restaurants, but apart from that, we have no idea what makes him tick.' oh and his superiors and the police around him are also terribly inept. Jackman is a survivalist, all American, possible religious nut who is also an alcoholic with an excruciatingly bad character bubbling under a surface, not very interesting. I was never sure if we were supposed to side with him so that we, the audience, were complicit in his violent actions later, but saw that I didn't really like him right from the get go and saw that I suspected that probably Paul Dano's massively red herring was probably not the bad guy (just looking at the trailer) that didn't really work for me. In fact, I found his reaction a little unrealistic and on top, but then I also found Paul Dano's character as annoying, stubborn idiot as Jackman found him. Spirit of a 10-year-old or not, traumatized or not, I did not buy for a second, he would remain silent as long as he did, when he had no problem talking to the character of Gyllenhaal for an apparent interrogation of 10 hours (we are told and see on video), Maria Bello, Viola Davis - Terrence Howard are all outrageously underexploited and irrelevant (mostly) and poor Melissa Leo is left to play, which slips very close to being, an old comic grandmother role. Complete with bad clothes, huge glasses and a terrible wig. I am, personally, amazed that this film was made as it did at all and, secondly, amazed that people love it so much. It's not that it's a bad movie. All right. It was just very obvious, banal, dark and too long.
